CONCEPT NOTE

This course focuses on computer revolution and its impact on legal order. Lord Coke's famous observation that the law has its "artificial reason" is now, perhaps, totally superseded by the artificial intelligence of advanced computer system. Modern technology is inconceivable without use of computer systems; this is clearly so in relation to the frontier technologies, e.g. nuclear technology, biotechnology, space technology, military technology. The advent of computer systems brings fresh challenges to orderly growth of legal systems in the future. At the same time, they render some of the existing legal conceptions obsolete, or at least problematic; they also provide a new terrain for violation of human rights. Science and technology are forces which have always shaped the nature of the legal order; in turn, the latter has also had a share of impact on the former. But in the last decades of twentieth century, the perils posed by hazardous technology, unconventional armament and biotechnology, for example, to human survival and dignity should alert us to the need for a very close study of reciprocal interaction between science, technology and legal order.

The school considers the most topical issues of Intellectual Property Law in the Digital Age, Information Technology Law, Telecommunications and Data Protection Law, New Technologies and Internet. Summer School on Cyber Law is aimed at assembling young specialists in the area of IT/IP law to give them an opportunity to discuss common challenges, global development trends, to exchange research results, to establish professional connections.

Participation in the Summer School is a wonderful opportunity to enjoy the atmosphere of contemporary academic thought and to master the skills of conducting academic discussions. Communication with participants from different countries will facilitate good interaction and exchange of ideas.
